A LETTER FROM THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

A Growing Concern: Abortion Pills Are Reaching Women in Our Community

Although abortion is prohibited in most circumstances under Alabama law, abortion pills ordered online and shipped through the mail are creating new challenges for women, families, and ministries like Wiregrass Hope.

Recently, a young woman from our community came to us facing an unexpected pregnancy with her third child. We had walked alongside her through her previous pregnancies, but this time she was overwhelmed and had already paid $120 to order abortion pills online.

Thankfully, before taking them, she came to Wiregrass Hope. After spending time with our staff, receiving support, and talking through her situation, she chose to turn the pills over to us and continue her pregnancy. What we saw concerned us: the package displayed no patient name, return address, or prescribing physician, and provided no information indicating where the medication had originated.

Her story is not an isolated concern. We are encountering women who can access abortion medication online even while living in a state where abortion is largely prohibited. In June, the Alabama Attorney General's Office issued cease-and-desist letters to six organizations it said were advertising, facilitating, or providing abortion-inducing drugs to Alabama consumers.

Because of what we are seeing firsthand, I recently reached out to U.S. Senator Katie Britt's office. On September 8, I met by phone with members of her staff to share actual situations we have encountered at Wiregrass Hope and discuss questions surrounding online access, interstate distribution, medical oversight, and women's health and safety.

Senator Britt's staff asked us to continue documenting what we are seeing and gathering anonymized stories that may help inform future policy discussions.

For Wiregrass Hope, however, this issue ultimately comes back to the individual woman sitting across from us.

Our recent client had pills in her hands, but she also had somewhere to turn. She had people willing to listen, walk beside her, offer practical support, and remind her that she did not have to face her circumstances alone.

Please pray that God continues to place Wiregrass Hope in the path of women at these critical moments. Pray that they will walk through our doors before making a decision... and that when they do, they will encounter compassion, truth, and hope.
